AUTHOR'S / SPONSOR'S STATEMENT OF INTENT

Peace officers are often dispatched to calls involving a person in a mental crisis. On occasion, these incidents involve persons who are in possession of a firearm at the time of their crisis. The individual in crisis may be suicidal, delusional, psychotic, and a danger to self or other persons.

If the person is believed to be a danger to self or others, he or she is detained under an emergency detention order, pursuant to the Health and Safety Code, and taken to a hospital for a mental health evaluation. Because of the severity of the illness, often there are no criminal charges filed on these individuals.

If the person in crisis had a firearm on their person or in their immediate control, officers will often take custody of the firearm and place it in the police property room for safekeeping. This is primarily the case when the person in crisis is in a public place and there is no safe place to leave the firearm.

If the person is court-ordered into in-patient psychiatric treatment, then the person is subsequently prohibited by Federal firearm laws from possessing a firearm. If the person is precluded from possessing a firearm due to in-patient treatment, then the law enforcement agency cannot return the weapon. Currently, there is no requirement that police agencies be informed of the outcome of the emergency mental health evaluation. Additionally, there is no state law that directs the law enforcement agency on how to dispose of the firearm so the agency must rely on the word of the person when they retrieve the person's firearm.

In situations where the firearm is on or about the person in crisis, peace officers have a duty to secure the weapon and place it in the police property room. Although, this is accepted as providing the "community caretaking" function on the part of the police, there is no wording in current law that gives police the legal authority to confiscate the firearm in these incidents, to secure the firearm until a determination is made on the person's mental stability, or to return the firearm if appropriate.

Chapter 573.001 (Apprehension by Peace Officer Without Warrant), Health and Safety Code, currently allows peace officers to take a person in custody without a warrant, when the officer believes the person is in a mental health crisis and a danger to themselves or others. State law only addresses the procedures for the disposition of weapons seized in connection with an offense involving the use of a weapon or an offense under Chapter 46 (Weapons), Penal Code. State law does not address the disposition of weapons confiscated by peace officers from those persons in a mental health crisis who are detained under an emergency detention order and subsequently taken for an emergency mental health evaluation.

C.S.S.B. 1189 amends Chapter 573.001, Health and Safety Code, by incorporating language that specifically authorizes peace officers to hold any firearm found on or about a person who is in a mental health crisis, is determined to be a danger to self or others, and is being detained and transported for an emergency mental health evaluation. Additionally, C.S.S.B. 1189 adds Article 18.191, Code of Criminal Procedure, to provide law enforcement with the necessary time to conduct follow-up investigations of the person taken for an emergency evaluation to determine whether the case was dismissed or the person was court ordered into in-patient psychiatric treatment. This bill requires the concerned courts of each county to verify for the investigating law enforcement agency if the person received court ordered in-patient psychiatric treatment, so that the agency will know whether or not it is permissible to return the firearm. Article 18.191 also includes procedures for law enforcement agencies to return the weapon to the owner or other potential party.

C.S.S.B. 1189 amends current law relating to the disposition of certain firearms seized by a law enforcement agency.
